Expanding on his previous work, Intelligence in the Information Age, the author discusses the challenges of intelligence in the information age. He argues that the information age has created a new environment for intelligence, one in which the flow of information is rapid and the sources are diverse. He discusses the challenges of intelligence in this environment, including the need for new methods of collection and analysis, and the need for new ways of sharing information. He also discusses the challenges of intelligence in the information age, including the need for new methods of collection and analysis, and the need for new ways of sharing information.
