

The NASA Insignia

The NASA insignia is the only allowable logo for external communications material that reaches the media or general public. It is our prime brand identifier, reflecting the history and tradition of the agency. Therefore, maintaining its visual and conceptual integrity is a high priority. Commonly referred to as "the meatball," the insignia must be included on all agency publications, displays, visual communications and markings. Designed in 1959 by former NASA employee James Modanelli, the NASA insignia contains the following elements:

Insignia Variations

The insignia has three variations: a full-color insignia, a one-color insignia and a one-color insignia with a white rule. Select the most appropriate of the three variations of the insignia based on production requirements, media qualities, visibility and proper usage (see pp. 44–47).

Full-color Insignia

One-color Insignia

One-color Insignia with white rule

The agency's policies regarding logo usage are designed to ensure that the public recognition of our primary identifier—the NASA insignia—is not diluted by other NASA identities.

Products that are exclusively for internal use may include program and project logos (see page 30).

Internal audiences are defined as NASA employees and contractors.

Detailed instructions for using the insignia can be found in the Insignia Guide on page 41.
