- the high Singapore HDI value (0.901) suggests that it is a “very high human development” country (Figure 1) whereas the lower Timor-Leste HDI figure (0.622) suggests that it is a “medium human development” country (Figure 1)
- the high Singapore HDI ranking (9) suggests that it is a “very high human development” country whereas the lower Timor-Leste HDI ranking (128) suggests that it is a “medium human development” country
- Singapore has significantly higher GDP per capita
- an explanation of how higher income per capita contributes to higher levels of economic development
- the data does not account for different levels of income inequality and absolute or relative poverty
- Singapore has higher life expectancy at birth suggesting better health of its people
- an explanation of how better health allows for higher levels of economic development
- Singapore has significantly higher mean years of schooling and higher expected years of schooling suggesting higher levels of education
