Cultural formulation

ABSTRACT

Cultural competence is an essential aspect of competence as a mental health professional. In this article, the framework of cultural competence developed in general psychiatry—acquiring knowledge, attitudes, and skills necessary to understand the interaction between culture and the individual—is applied to the prison setting. Race and ethnicity, extremes of age, gender, and religion are highlighted and examined as elements of the overall culture of prisons. The model of the cultural formulation from the DSM-IV[®] is then adapted for use by clinicians in the correctional setting, with particular emphasis on the interaction between the inmate's culture of origin and the unique culture of the prison environment.

1. Introduction

The field of cultural psychiatry has grown exponentially in the past 20 years, and the mental health professions now regard it as axiomatic that an understanding of culture is necessary in order to provide competent treatment. A framework for use of the cultural formulation has been included in the appendix of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) since the Fourth Edition (Table 1), and many scholars have developed tools to help clinicians and health care systems conduct cultural assessments (Kagan-Singer & Kassim-Ledha, 2003; Lewis-Fernandez & Diaz, 2002; Parikh, 2012; Teal & Street, 2009). Although the literature in cultural psychiatry is vast, even a cursory review reveals a consensus about the important areas of focus: language, ethnic background and identification, family relationships, child rearing, spiritual beliefs, social networks, past traumatic experiences, and beliefs about mental illness. The principle behind cultural competence is simple. When mental health professionals understand culture, they are less likely to misinterpret cultural differences as signs of mental illness. Furthermore, an appreciation of culture helps to cultivate a fundamental respect for the patient and his life experiences that will, in turn, promote the development of a tolerant, thoughtful plan of care.

In contrast to its ubiquity in general psychiatry, the concept of cultural competence has not been well developed in the subspecialties of correctional psychiatry and forensic psychiatry. The lack of emphasis on culture in prison psychiatry is understandable, given the struggles of many correctional systems to provide basic access to mental health treatment for the ever-increasing population of severely mentally ill inmates (Human Rights Watch, 2003; James & Glaze, 2006). However, scholarship in correctional psychiatry has flourished in recent years, and the field has now articulated formal guidelines and standards for the provision of mental health care in prisons (NCCHC, 2008; Scott, 2009). These guidelines acknowledge the importance of culturally competent care, though it has so far been only a small area of focus for correctional psychiatry.

Although there is very little written in the psychiatric literature about culture and correctional mental health, prison administrators and scholars in the social sciences have been studying culture in prisons for more than half a century (Brodsky, 1973; Clemmer, 1960; Haney, 2001; Haney, Banks, & Zimbardo, 1973). From these studies, as well as from the writing of inmates themselves, a grim depiction of prison culture has emerged. Prison culture is widely portrayed as a struggle between “captor and caged” (Branham, 2011)—violent, predatory, and corrosive to mental health. More recent work has focused on the challenges faced by certain subcultures of prisoners, such as transgender inmates and inmates in supermax facilities, who are considered particularly vulnerable (Brown & McDuffie, 2009; Metzner & Fellner, 2010). Still other work has focused on advocacy for widespread reform, arguing that prison culture as it has developed in the U.S. is contrary to human dignity and simply unacceptable. For example, keeping prisoners in prolonged solitary confinement has been compared to torture (Haney, 2008; United Nations General Assembly, 2011).

The challenge for scholars today is to marry the body of knowledge about prison culture developed in social science with the knowledge about prison mental health developed in medicine. Some initial attempts have been made to merge the disciplines, including textbook chapters that address multicultural counseling, psychological testing,
