SECTION A

Question 1 Examine the Significance of Fofu's visit to Odarley in the novel?

Fofu and Odarley are street children scrounging for a living around the Agbogbloshie market area. Fofu flees one early morning to Odarley's shack after her escape from the hands of the rapist, Poison.

The plight of street children is highlighted during this visit. An attempt has just been made by a 'street lord' to rape Fofu, a fourteen-year-old homeless girl, as she sleeps in front of a provision shop in Agbogbloshie market. In her unprotected condition, she is exposed to the vagaries of the weather and the ravages of lawless men.

Odarley's shack offers only a slightly better protection. The description of the shack is striking. The lack of adequate ventilation and children strewn about the single room in various states of undress, underscore the poverty, destitution and degradation which children who are forced to fend for themselves have to face.

Social immorality has now become a part of the children's lives. The shoeshine boy and the iced water seller are fast asleep, naked. Odarley surmises that the couple had had sex the night before. Indiscriminate sex no longer shocks the children. Odarley is, herself, a part of the group. Thus, she conjectures that because she still has her underpants on, the shoeshine boy had probably mistaken the iced water seller for her. The import here is that she and the shoeshine boy have had sexual encounters in the past. It is in these circumstances that Fofu comes to visit Odarley.
