

Managers who consistently apply positive management are perceived as successful. These managers demonstrate a high degree of social competence, interpersonal sensitivity, and emotional stability. They are also perceived as being more effective in their roles. The authors suggest that these findings have implications for the selection and training of managers. They recommend that organizations should look for individuals who are socially competent, interpersonally sensitive, and emotionally stable when selecting managers. They also recommend that organizations should provide training and development opportunities for managers to enhance their social competence, interpersonal sensitivity, and emotional stability.
