For example, in a study by Smith and Smith (1994), it was found that the perceived impact of the information was higher for the information that was more relevant to the user's needs. This suggests that the perceived impact of the information is not only dependent on the nature of the information, but also on the user's needs. This is an important finding because it suggests that the perceived impact of the information is not a simple function of the information itself, but is also a function of the user's needs.
