How is a PCB Fabricated

If you open up your printer, television, or desktop computer, you are likely to find a rigid board inside with electronic components mounted on it. This is the Printed Circuit Board, or PCB, as it is commonly known. More modern equipment, such as your Smartphone or your laptop computer, also have a PCB or several PCBs inside, but they are more likely to be flexible rather than of the rigid type. As people prefer thin laptops and Smartphones, space inside them is at a premium, and flexible PCBs are more suitable in such confined areas.

PCBs are an important part of any electronic equipment or device. The basic functionality of a PCB is to provide order and method in mechanically anchoring the components on it and providing them with proper electrical connection. Any PCB will have a substrate that offers the mechanical support and electrical insulation, and metal tracks on the substrate to provide the electrical connections. Flexible PCBs have a non-rigid substrate that allows them to bend.

Manufacturers fabricate PCBs in much the same manner whether they are rigid or flexible. They chemically etch away the unwanted copper from the surface of the substrate to produce the PCB. They need to drill holes in the PCB to allow mounting of through-hole components. Surface Mount Components or SMCs do not require holes, and as they take up much less space compared to through-hole components, the former are a more preferable choice with designers.
