WHAT IS DEVELOPMENTAL PSYCHOLOGY?

Psychologists who study lifespan development aim to understand, describe, explain and predict the many ways in which our thoughts, feelings and behaviour change throughout our lives. A change must be relatively permanent to be considered a developmental change.

There are many different kinds of developmental changes throughout the human lifespan. Psychologists classify these changes in four main areas: physical, cognitive, social and emotional. This is the study of developmental psychology.

AREA OF DEVELOPMENT

Physical (biological) development

Some changes are very noticeable (e.g. when a child can sit up unaided) while others are less noticeable and occur internally (e.g. Increase in hormones which is only noticeable indirectly).

Cognitive development

Refers to the mental processes of problem solving, perceiving and reasoning, learning, language, memory and moral reasoning. It is the emergence of ability to think and understand.
