

The Lewis and Clark Expedition Across Missouri

On the morning of Monday, August 15, 1804, the expedition left St. Louis for the west. The party consisted of 54 men, 3 horses, and a dog. They traveled down the Mississippi River to the mouth of the Missouri River, where they spent the winter of 1804-1805. The expedition returned to St. Louis on September 23, 1806.

William Clark, Journal, May 1804

On June 15, 1804, the Lewis and Clark Expedition passed the site of present-day Glasgow. The party was on a side branch from the mouth of the Missouri and they were fighting with currents and floating debris from the river that had been falling for the last two days. At one point the expedition passed a part of the river where the banks were falling in taking large cutwaters down with them. But the crew was not getting more accustomed to dealing with the treacherous river. Following one particularly perilous encounter on June 14, one sailor, William Clark, Capt. William Clark wrote in his journal: "I can say with Confidence that our party is not inferior to any that was ever on the waters of the Mississippi."

From the lower site of Glasgow, the expedition encountered the two "Chaletons" (Chaleton Rivers). Clark knew that the Big Chaleton River could be navigated by passage for a good distance and that the men's food stores were near those of the Big Missouri River on which the Lewis follows land. As the men a major confluence, the expedition halted for an hour and a half while Capt. Meriwether Lewis made several observations with his scientific instruments.

Not far above the confluence, the expedition halted at an island and waited for the horses to finish to graze. While there, the men were plagued by swarms of mosquitoes. When the horses arrived, the boats were again against a well current. They passed a large island Clark called "Blower" or "Blower" (the phonetic rendering of the French word above meaning strong), and then pulled ashore at a point on the left-hand (southern) side and set up camp. The following struggle against the swift currents of the Missouri, the constant rain, and the swarms of insects did not dampen the morale of the Corps of Discovery. Clark concluded his journal entry for June 15 by writing, "The morning is cloudy, our party is high spirits."

THE LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION ENCOUNTERED THE MISSOURI

By the time the expedition passed Glasgow, it was being pelted by another force and some of the men were sick and eating a soup of muskrat points. The boat is caught in the snags of a river that was only described by William Clark, Clark called the river white and "blower" (the phonetic rendering of good) and just after being it accompanied with points of natural rock. These points are all covered by moss, as a number of them are in the Missouri bed of moss they might pass. They should not that Clark it could point of a Superior quality called the Upper River. Some on a boat the top of a boat and it flows down the river of other boats and long in great quantities on the banks. The great numbers of them in the North" judging from their descriptions. The expedition members never knew though they were in fact "gilded" as the journal continued. "What will ever frequent Clark and the other members of the expedition know of the West and history of the present day was unnecessary.

This photograph shows the site of the expedition's camp near Glasgow, Missouri. The river is the Missouri River, and the cliff is the Big Chaleton River. The expedition camped here for several days in 1804. The photograph was taken by a local resident in 1900.
