The Lewis & Clark Expedition

Meriwether Lewis and William Clark set off on an expedition of discovery in May 1804. They crossed the western part of the United States and returned in September 1806. The two explorers began near the city of St. Louis and made their way west. The pair passed all the way through to the Pacific coast.

President Thomas Jefferson ordered the expedition shortly after the Louisiana Purchase in 1803. His aim was to explore new land before Britain and other European countries tried to claim it. The expedition returned to St. Louis to report to Jefferson. Another of Thomas Jefferson's goals was to find the quickest and easiest way across the continent.

During the 19th century, the names of Lewis and Clark did not appear in many history books. However, afterwards they began to gain fame. Now, no American expedition leaders are as well known as the two famous friends.
