5.1 The Enlightenment

• The Enlightenment

The Enlightenment was an intellectual and ideological movement centered in 18th century Europe that advocated the use of reason to reconsider the accepted ideas and social institutions of the time. The Enlightenment thinking occasioned the social and political changes that were necessary for the Industrial Revolution.

- Rejected traditional ways of thinking in favor of the application of logic and reason.
- It was the application of human reason to natural laws. The world was ordered by a set of natural laws, and if we could tap into the wisdom of those natural laws, and apply them to our society, then progress would occur. Previously, reality was understood through religious and given thought. However, the Enlightenment believed that it is only the working of our minds and the understanding of natural laws that will lead us to the truth.
- When philosophers identified a principle to reject, they replaced it by asking important and relevant questions, and answering their own questions through their own experiences, empirical evidence, and the application of reason and logic.

Francis Bacon

Empiricism~ the idea that the nature of reality is discerned through the senses, not through external beliefs such as religion.

- Scientific experiments were conducted to determine whether something was true or false.

John Locke

- The divine right of kings was a deeply flawed organization of the political hierarchy
- Human beings are endowed with natural rights such as life, liberty, and property. These rights are not granted by a king, but by the virtue of a living human being, and therefore humans ought to have the power in a government.
- Humans and their governments were in a social contract with each other, meaning if the power of the government is in the hands of the people, the social contract means this:
- The people willingly give up some of their power to the government, which is responsible for protecting their natural rights. If the government violates this social contract, the people have the right to overthrow the government. This resulted in the notion of revolution.

Enlightenment principles like the equality of human beings led to the breakup of empires and the proliferation of constitutional governments around the world, and a growing sense of nationalism.

Nationalism~ a strong identification of a group of people who share an identity or a language.
