

Question 17 (continued)

Marking guidelines:

Criteria	Marks
- Provides reasons for the observations - Clearly relates the observations to Lenz's Law and conservation of energy	5
- Provides reasons for the observations - Applies both Lenz's Law and conservation of energy - Provides some reasons for the observations	4
- Uses Lenz's Law and/or conservation of energy - Shows some understanding of Lenz's Law and/or conservation of energy	3
Provides some relevant information	2
	1

Sample answer:

When the magnet is pushed into ring B the ring is repelled, but is attracted when the magnet is pulled back out. This is due to the fact that the moving magnet induces a current in the ring. Lenz's Law states that the induced current is in the direction such that the magnetic field produced by this current opposes the original change caused by the moving magnet. This means that pushing a magnet into the ring creates a 'like' pole, repelling the magnet, and pulling the ring out creates an 'opposite' pole, attracting the magnet. This is an application of the law of conservation of energy, as, if the current were in the other direction, the field produced would cause a movement that increases the change in flux even more, thereby producing even more current, and violating conservation of energy. When the magnet is pushed into ring A, no repulsive or attractive force is observed because the gap in the ring prevents a current from being induced, so no magnetic field is created as a result.
