Your lab group has been asked to identify another unknown animal. The only information you have is 1) it is a member of either Phylum Platyhelminthes or Phylum Nematoda, 2) it is discussed in this lab, and 3) the animal that you are observing is an adult. Your observations note the following: male but not female reproductive structures, a groove that runs lengthwise along the creature's body, and a pseudocoel. What is this creature?

Your observations include the following: tentacles, a prostomium, a peristomium, a closed circulatory system, and parapodia. What is this creature?

Lab 11 Porifera and Cnidaria

Do sponges appear to have any organs or organ systems?

No

What function other than support might spicules serve?

Spicules also provide protection to the animal. In some cases, they also behave as light-transmitting structures on deep sea sponges.

What specialized cells of tentacles aid in capturing prey?

Cnidocytes

Explain how cnidocytes with their nematocysts function in food capture and defense.

Anemones, jellyfish and some coral catch small marine animals and food by trailing their tentacles through the water. The nematocytes in the cnidocytes operate like harpoons and sting filament to grab anything that comes close enough to trigger the cnidocytes trigger. The cnidocytes sting also keeps predators well away.
