monopolist 13 minutes 14/10 12/13

Until now we have assumed that our company only produces one good. But now we see the case where they have more than one.

Product variety

Usually firms sell more than one product.

How much variety should a firm offer?

Horizontal product differentiation

By offering several varieties of what is essentially the same product, a firm can appeal and sell to consumers with different tastes.

When a firm offers a variety of products in response to different consumer tastes, it is adopting a horizontal product differentiation strategy.

Horizontal product differentiation

Products are horizontally differentiated if consumers prefer different products when they have the same price.

Vertical product differentiation

There are cases in which consumers agree on the product features that make for a good product.

For example, all consumers agree that a car with airbags is better than a car without airbags. However, consumers differ in how much they are willing to pay for airbags.

When a firm responds to differences in consumer willingness to pay for quality by offering different qualities of the same product, it is adopting a vertical product differentiation strategy.

Vertical product differentiation

Products are vertically differentiated if all consumers rank them in the same way when they have the same price.
