dimensions to be easily understood with moderate magnification and in no way can objects of this description be so readily obtained as by devoting an occasional hour to the examination of the little ponds which are accessible from almost any situation. A complete volume of pond lore would not only be a bulky book much bigger than the aldermanic tomes which it is the fashion to call Manuals although the great stone fists in the British Museum would be required to grasp them comfortably but its composition would overtask all the philosophers of our day. In good truth a tea spoonful of water from a prolific locality often contains a variety of living forms every one of which demands a profound and patient study if we would know but a few things concerning it.
