aid for aspiring college students without a high school diploma or a GED and by the planned 2014 implementation of a new GED exam that emphasizes college readiness To better understand how adult education programs might strengthen pathways to college and careers MDRC with financial support from the Robin Hood Foundation and MetLife Foundation partnered with LaGuardia Community College of the City University of New York CUNY to launch a small but rigorous study of the GED Bridge to Health and Business program The GED Bridge program represents a promising new approach to GED instruction as it aims to better prepare students not only to pass the GED exam but also to continue on to college and training programs MDRC has conducted several evaluations of programs that include GED preparation as one among many program components but this evaluation is one of only a few to focus specifically on GED curriculum program design and efforts to forge a stronger link to college and career training The results are highly encouraging One year after enrolling in the program Bridge students were far more likely to have completed the course passed the GED exam and enrolled in college than students in a more traditional GED preparation course This brief details some of the key findings from this study as well as their implications for future research and for the development of stronger GED and adult education programming
