9 pages | 2145 words

Attending college is worth it. Students who a college education and graduate have many more life changing opportunities than those who don 't; the debates of studying after high school has been ongoing for countless years, but statistics have proven that majority to all students who go to college achieve more life goals than the average high school graduate. They receive better work benefits, life skills, higher paying salaries, etc. There is a downside to everything in life such as debt is to college education. However, the price students pay is insufficient compared to what the benefits they receive after graduating from college.College graduates earn more money than high school graduates. The average annual income for someone without a college education was around $40,000 in 2010, but someone with the college education made twice or even higher that income even today. A student studying for around two years, an associate 's degree, made higher in a lifetime than the student with only the high school diplomas. The greatest advantage to have to order to receive a higher salary a high school graduate is to obtain some sort of a college degree.Just as universities are competitive with whom they choose to study on their campus, abundant jobs have become competitive with whom they hire to work for them. Universities will offer a greater amount of scholarships to high school students who have displayed earnest work and discipline. Acceptable paying jobs have some requisites as well. They will pay extra to the workers who have worked exhaustively to earn it just as how the university offered more aid to the students who worked intensely; most people are accepted into college just as some land a job, but the ones who receive more money are the ones who worked years for it..Not having a college degree doesn 't mean one will not have a job but it will be much more difficult for them to find one since the job markets have become more competitive each year. The unemployment rate in 2013 for college graduates that were older than 25 was 3.6% as to high school graduates which was 7.5%. Numerous employers look for someone who has a degree to work in their company. It shows them that the person seeking the job cares enough to improve themselves, are responsible, work well under stress, carries out good decisions, and much more. One who attends college knows that it is a lot more difficult than high school and it helps one grow as a person. Employers value these types of workers in their business.College graduates are more likely to receive greater benefits from their jobs. Many, compared to high school graduates, are given access health insurance and/or retirement plans; they receive about $6,000 more in a year in retirement income than high school graduates do. Companies offer greater health benefits such as insurance to people with higher degrees or a degree at all. They make sure that their employer is in good shape and feels welcomed working in the business so that they will stay there longer providing their services.If bounteous amounts of people...
