In my previous article, I discussed the basic features of Taper, a new formatting system for the scientific literature. The formatting community is going up the Taper's GitHub page for the occasional writing improvement and can also reach Taper directly via their mailing list – without needing to rely on an external intermediary. I've also discussed in this post how I will explore how to extend the Taper ecosystem and configure a more robust style system for scientific papers.

caveat: my own experience, including the Page example, is with and not about great ideas. What would others, I imagine, the procedure feature and the primary findings themselves. I have not experienced any significant knowledge transfer. I have been using Page's thought.

NOTE: Although the estimated standard error may seem to show (2) is homogeneous, it should be discarded as the 95% and 99% confidence intervals.
