

INTRODUCTION

Database

A Database is a collection of information related to a particular subject or purpose, such as tracking customer orders or maintaining a music collection. Using Microsoft Access, you can manage all your information from a single database file. However, whenever you create an Access database you need to create different types of files (database objects) where each are dedicated for some purpose. Access 2003 program is organized into the following parts: Tables, Queries, Forms, Reports, Pages, Macros, Modules, Groups and Favorites. However, this manual discusses the first four basic parts. The remaining parts are advanced and require the user to know programming languages.

- Tables: are used to store data. Create one table for each type of information you track.
- Queries: are used to find and retrieve the data that meets criteria or conditions you specify.
- Forms: are used to easily view, enter and change data directly in a table.
- Reports: are used to analyze or summarize your data or present it in a certain way in print. For example, you might print one report that groups data and calculates totals, and another report with different data formatted for printing mailing labels.
- Pages: is a feature designed to help you easily use the Internet for data access and management. You need a web browser, such as Microsoft Internet Explorer and modem. You can create data access pages which are web pages that you can use to add, edit, view or manipulate current data in a Microsoft Access database or a Microsoft SQL Server database.

Designing a Database

Before you use Microsoft Access to actually build the tables, forms and other database objects that will make up your database, it is important to take time to design your database. A good database design is the keystone to creating a database that does what you want it to do effectively, accurately, and efficiently.

Basic steps in designing a database

1. Determine the purpose of your database and how it is used

The purpose of the database file, for a hypothetical supermarket, can be to keep track of transactions made by customers; to produce a bill for each customer when the customer's credit level reach some amount, and to produce a monthly report for managers on sales made. Deciding the purpose of a database will help you which data you want Microsoft Access to store in order to perform the expected output.

2. Determine the tables you need in the database

Once you have a clear purpose for your database, and got some hint about the information that should be stored, you can divide the information into separate subjects; such as Customers- to hold information about all customers and Charges- to hold information about each transactions made by customers.

3. Determine the fields you need in the tables

Decide individual elements of data (fields) that should be stored in each table. To determine the fields in a table; decide what you need to know about the people, thing or events recorded in the table. For instance, information that is needed to be known about customers is: their Name (First name, Second name), Address (such as Telephone, P.O.Box, and City), and facts needed to be known about Transactions are: person who made the transaction, item number, unit price, quantity and date of transaction. When sketching out the fields for each table, keep these tips in mind:

- Relate each field directly to the subject of the table
